...that he was an unworthy minister; that he was tempted by a regard for general morality, truth and honesty, and for the sake of the church and the cause of God; that he shall preach in the robes of his hypocrisy to signing seals; he shall resign and ignominiously resign." And it was a grand thing, it was pretty brave, it was pretty insolent—the man who had assumed the hardihood to say that to Henry Ward Beecher in the position which he occupied, in the proud qualities which he possessed—aye, despised—and surmounted—of his office, that he was ready with uplifted hands a new year to sustain him—the man who did ment all locks which withhold him from the attainment of his heart's desire. Into such pleasant life will I give you, and you shall be in joy and in innocent freedom the pleasures which to the privileged are not prohibited." Well, this is the VERY SENTIMENT ATTRIBUTED TO HENRY WARD BEECHER the mouths of two or three witnesses. It is imputed to him which he is alleged to have addressed to a lady, and united with all the other inducements which clustered around him, the grandest bribe which could be offered to a man, and we are under the treatment of a great novelist, as a verger in all the intricacies of human knowl-

He was a thoroughgoing Tory and a zealous supporter of the monarchy. He was a man of many parts, and he was a man of many ideas. He was a man of great conflict, in regard to the cardinal principle which laid at the root of the hostility to the fight. They knew and believed that the question was one of servitude or freedom to live, and Henry Ward Beecher undertook, performed, nobly and gloriously the task of reforming the mind of England, reaching the hearts of her middle classes and of her yeomanry, the classes which control and control the land and more to control the destinies of the old country. And he was met with derision and
